

Always, “Life is Worth Living”: Confronting the Culture of Death with Saint John Paul II’s “Gospel of Life” - Rev. Martin Ifeanyi Onuoha

In 1920, when two German professors, Karl Binding and Alfred Hoche, conceived the idea of ‘Life unworthy of life’ (in their Allowing the Destruction of Life Unworthy of Life), no one would have imagined the impending annihilation that lurked. Their book was the precursor of a 1942 propaganda film (Dasein ohne Leben – Psychiatrie und Menschlichkeit [Existence Without Life – Psychiatry and Humanity]) which, by distinguishing Existence from Living, openly advocated what had been Nazi practice even before the war. The phrase and idea subsequently became foundational to the Nazi designation of some fragments of the society – mainly people with birth defects, epilepsy, alcoholism, vision loss, hearing loss, mental illnesses, personality disorders, developmental delays and even those who suffered from certain orthopedic problems - as not worthy of life, leading to mass exterminations. From the granting of a petition to kill one severely disabled child, this spiralled into what became known as mercy killing or euthanasia. Thus, ‘life unworthy of life’ theory was progressively implemented first through coercive sterilization, the killing of “impaired” children in hospitals, the killing of “impaired” adults, and then it was eventually extended unimpeded to “impaired” inmates of concentration and extermination camps and, finally, to mass killings’ in advancement of such bigoted ends as the institutionalisation of racial supremacy. This was surreptitiously executed. Hitler’s own chief medical officer said that this would be implemented ‘more smoothly and rapidly in time of war’ since, ‘in the general upheaval of war, the open resistance anticipated from the church would not play the part it might in other circumstances’. (R. N. Proctor, “Culling the German Volk”). One wonders whether there would not have been the temptation to infer some analogy had the attempt to push through the Assisted Dying Bill in the United Kingdom and in Ireland in the midst of the pandemic been successful. Of course, such comparison would be preposterous. Yet it is important to be conscious that we could, once again, be up against the same phrase - ‘unworthy of life’ - with its ‘moral’ claim that human life is only valuable if it is of a certain quality and its political sense that the state may allow some officials to decide a level of life below which deliberate termination is lawful.

Indeed, we are a long way from the horrors of Nazi Germany and all of those who now strongly support euthanasia would be understandably and rightly appalled if their reasoning or motives were compared with those of that time. Neither Binding nor Hoche nor, of course, any Nazi, did or could rightfully claim to be motivated by compassion but the biggest single argument used nowadays for euthanasia is compassion and it is justified under the umbrella of individual choice. However, whether we have a right to terminate the lives of those who ask for it and whether those who ask for euthanasia have a right so to do cannot be decided on the basis solely of compassion but on the very nature of human life itself. Here we need to use the reason given to us by God to understand both this basic moral question and to determine the probable long-term consequences of legalising euthanasia.

Manifestly, euthanasia in any form discards any notion that life is something received, and that human life has a sacred value in itself. Such concepts are not unique to Christianity. However, the most tenacious and perspicuous defence of the two principles of life as a gift and as sacred was made by Pope John Paul II, both in his writings and in his personal witness of enduring a prolonged ill health and pain till life’s natural end. He insisted that “Human life is sacred because, from its beginning, it involves ‘the creative action of God’, and it remains forever in a special relationship with the Creator, who is its sole end”. Therefore, “God alone is the Lord of life from its beginning until its end: no one can, in any circumstance, claim for himself the right to destroy directly an innocent human being”. (Evangelium Vitae, No. 53; Donum Vitae No.5; Gen 9:6) This is decreed by God himself: “For your own lifeblood, too, I will demand an accounting and from man in regard to his fellow man I will demand an accounting for human life”. (Gen. 9:5; EV. 39) Consequently, life possesses a sacredness which gives rise to its inviolability, written from the beginning in man’s heart, in his conscience. (EV. 40) These principles need to be upheld and made intelligible to the world at large. The arguments of those advocating euthanasia, however well-intended they seem, need to be examined and contested clearly. To be continued.....
